Another French writer, supplementing Lamartine on this point, remarks that this matter of learning how to say things comes as swift, sometimes, as the merging of the first gray light of day into the full rose-glory of completed dawn. Still another Frenchman, a scientist, declared that after he had spent long weary years in trying to master a complex Copyright, 1887, by William obstacle, and had been forced to abandon it in despair, it suddenly flashed upon him, one day, in distinct clearness, when he was pondering an altogether different problem. The writer's knack is apt to come as the lightning comes. It can be sought, earnestly and diligently, in every practicable direction; it can be theorized and struggled for with the most relentless persistence; its cause may be...
