It is designed to supplement the regular State Manual, and will form the basis for the eighth grade examination in agriculture. I feel that we have been fortunate in the authorship of the Manual. Mr. Richardson has been until recently instructor in agriculture in the Snohomish public schools, and has brought to his writing the knowledge acquired not only from a thorough study of the science, but also from experience in presenting it to boys and girls. The aim in the preparation of the Manual has been to aid teachers, particularly teachers in rural schools, who have had no training in agriculture and who have no laboratory equipment at hand, in the task of presenting the elementary phases of agriculture in a way that will accomplish valuable results. I feel from an examination of the material offered, that the aim has been well met and that the exercises will prove not only suggestive, but actually usable by the teachers of the state. The point of view chosen for the Manual was that of experiment. While there are many good texts in agriculture on the market, in most cases their treatment of the science is academic. The endeavor here has been not to study agriculture through a text book, though supplementary literature will be found helpful, but by drawing on...
